

Goblin

Goblins, with their small build and innate tendency to run from danger, are surprisingly adaptable to nearly any environment. While often cowardly in the face of immediate threat, a Goblin's heightened sense of curiosity often leaves them running headlong into trouble. Unstable or unknown magic, unexplored caverns, and a chance to gather a precious trophy from a deep tomb are far more valuable to a Goblin than even their own lives, at times.

While many wild Goblins will live in caves and jungles, many others will live in civilizations amongst other races wherever they are permitted. Goblins are not seen as equals by many others and, as such, are not often found in less tolerant cities or civilizations. This hesitation does not come without justification, however, as many Goblins despise civilization and seek pleasure in burning and pillaging. Those who do not share this destructive view are often rather friendly, looking to entertain others with stories of grandiose adventure.

When upright, Goblins stand around 3'6". Covered in fur with tints of blues, greens or even pinks, a Goblin prefers to run on all fours whenever possible, especially when climbing and scampering. Their eyes are often a green or brown color, narrowing into vertical slits to see in darkness. Long, sharp claws extend from the end of each finger giving Goblins slight defenses when cornered.
